

Communication Analysis

This communication experience was an email exchange between me and the university's student portal support team, "The CONCIERGE," about an online document request I submitted. In this situation, I was the student trying to fix an issue with my request. My goal was to provide the correct details needed to remove the "ON-HOLD" status from my documents. The interaction started when I received a notification from the portal and ended when I sent a clarification through email.

When I first read the email from the portal, I noticed that it lacked completeness and clarity. It informed me that my request was on hold, it did not clearly explain which documents were missing or what mistake I made during the submission. Because of this, I was unsure about what I needed to correct at first. This relates to Grice's Maxim of Quantity since the email did not give enough information for me to immediately solve the problem.

In my reply, I tried to make my message clear and direct. Instead of sending a long paragraph, I used a simple bulleted format to specify that I needed "1 copy of each" document. I also clearly identified the two requested files, which were my Certificate of Enrolment and my AY25-26 Term

2 Grades. By doing this, I was able to provide the exact details needed for the request. This followed Grice's Maxim of Quantity because I gave enough information, and the Maxim of Relation because everything I included was connected to the concern about the hold status. I also applied the Maxim of Manner by organizing my message in a neat and understandable way.

The communication became successful because the enrollment staff understood my clarification. I realized a few things that I can improve next time requesting a documents. First, I should already include complete details, such as quantities and specific requirements, during my first submission to avoid delays or hold requests. Second, I can make my email more organized by including my ID number in the message right away so the staff can identify my records more easily.
